Iraq bombings hit new high

Baghdad, Iraq (AP) — A series of massive bombings in Baghdad on Sunday killed at least 100 people and wounded more than 300 others, the highest death toll in a single attack since the U.S.-led coalition forces invaded Iraq in 2003.

The bombings, which began at about 10 a.m. local time, targeted a busy commercial district in the heart of the city. A large crowd of people was seen running through the streets, and many buildings were damaged.

U.S. military officials said the bombings were the result of a coordinated attack by Iraqi insurgents. They said the attacks were part of a larger campaign to destabilize the Iraqi government and drive U.S. forces out of the country.

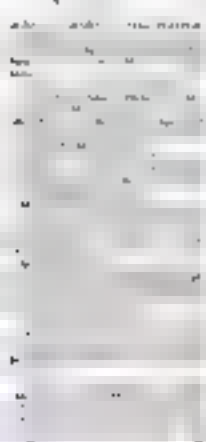

The U.S. military said it was not clear if the bombings were the work of a single group or multiple groups. However, it said the attacks were a clear message from the insurgents that they were still active and capable of carrying out large-scale operations.

The Iraqi government said it was investigating the bombings and had ordered a state of emergency in Baghdad. It said it was working to identify the perpetrators and bring them to justice.

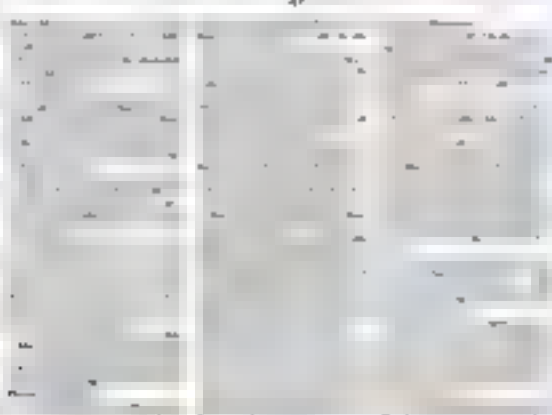

The bombings came at a time when the Iraqi government was struggling to stabilize the country and rebuild its infrastructure. The U.S. military said it was providing support to the Iraqi government in this effort.
